Improvements underway at Swallows Park

CLARKSTON, Wash. – Security improvements and restroom upgrades are underway at Swallows Park as part of an U.S. Army Corps of Engineers effort to increase public comfort and safety.

“We installed security cameras recently in Swallows Park to provide a safer and more family-friendly atmosphere,” said Craig Rockwell, Assistant Manager of the Clarkston Natural Resource Office.

Rockwell said the Corps’ Natural Resources staff will analyze film footage collected from the cameras to identify and address potential public safety concerns because “we want our visitors to feel and be safe while visiting their parks.”

In addition, the existing restroom in the day use area will be replaced with a more functional facility with several features to improve overall customer satisfaction and reduce operational costs. With automatic flush-valves and faucets, the new restroom will be more sanitary and convenient for the visitors. The new restroom also will be more universally accessible, maintenance-free and energy-efficient.
